The Independent Saturday 25 May 2002

HOME

1 The guerrilla gardener

Richard Reynolds began what he believes is a revolution in the urban jungle of London in September 2001. Several times a month, he and a handful of other hardy people start their journey to transform the unprepossessing nook he calls home in the Elephant and Castle area of south London, using a bicycle and a trolley. Armed with tools, some compost and a few plants, they set out on their epic quest to bring beauty to the local environment.

One of the first sites they took on was a derelict lot on a quiet inner-city street. Here they transformed a piece of concrete into a garden paradise. Today, the site is a vibrant oasis, filled with flowers and plants, a testament to the power of urban gardening.

2 The red-hot chili peppers

West Dean is the botanical English country house, nestled in the South Downs, near Chichester in West Sussex, the home of John and Annabelle Rendle, and their twin children, Philip and James. The couple have created an extensive collection of plants and flowers, which is open to the public.

The Rendles have been growing red-hot chili peppers for many years, and they are now harvesting huge quantities of the fiery peppers. The peppers are used in the family's cooking, and they also sell them at local markets.

3 The sky gardens

An artist and illustrator in London, Lyndon Bonython, was inspired by the whiteflower bush with abandon. With some stellar support, thanks to a generous sponsor, the artist launched his first major project. The project is called "Sky Gardens," and it is a series of installations that transform abandoned spaces in the city into beautiful gardens.

Originally from South Wales, he is an artist whose work explores the relationship between humans and nature. His installations are a response to the urban environment, and they aim to bring beauty and serenity to the city.

4 The railway gardener

An artist and illustrator in London, Lyndon Bonython, was inspired by the whiteflower bush with abandon. With some stellar support, thanks to a generous sponsor, the artist launched his first major project. The project is called "Sky Gardens," and it is a series of installations that transform abandoned spaces in the city into beautiful gardens.

Originally from South Wales, he is an artist whose work explores the relationship between humans and nature. His installations are a response to the urban environment, and they aim to bring beauty and serenity to the city.

5 The guerrilla gardener

Richard Reynolds began what he believes is a revolution in the urban jungle of London in September 2001. Several times a month, he and a handful of other hardy people start their journey to transform the unprepossessing nook he calls home in the Elephant and Castle area of south London, using a bicycle and a trolley. Armed with tools, some compost and a few plants, they set out on their epic quest to bring beauty to the local environment.

One of the first sites they took on was a derelict lot on a quiet inner-city street. Here they transformed a piece of concrete into a garden paradise. Today, the site is a vibrant oasis, filled with flowers and plants, a testament to the power of urban gardening.

2 The red-hot chili peppers

West Dean is the botanical English country house, nestled in the South Downs, near Chichester in West Sussex, the home of John and Annabelle Rendle, and their twin children, Philip and James. The couple have created an extensive collection of plants and flowers, which is open to the public.

The Rendles have been growing red-hot chili peppers for many years, and they are now harvesting huge quantities of the fiery peppers. The peppers are used in the family's cooking, and they also sell them at local markets.

3 The sky gardens

An artist and illustrator in London, Lyndon Bonython, was inspired by the whiteflower bush with abandon. With some stellar support, thanks to a generous sponsor, the artist launched his first major project. The project is called "Sky Gardens," and it is a series of installations that transform abandoned spaces in the city into beautiful gardens.

Originally from South Wales, he is an artist whose work explores the relationship between humans and nature. His installations are a response to the urban environment, and they aim to bring beauty and serenity to the city.

4 The railway gardener

An artist and illustrator in London, Lyndon Bonython, was inspired by the whiteflower bush with abandon. With some stellar support, thanks to a generous sponsor, the artist launched his first major project. The project is called "Sky Gardens," and it is a series of installations that transform abandoned spaces in the city into beautiful gardens.

Originally from South Wales, he is an artist whose work explores the relationship between humans and nature. His installations are a response to the urban environment, and they aim to bring beauty and serenity to the city.

5 The guerrilla gardener

Richard Reynolds began what he believes is a revolution in the urban jungle of London in September 2001. Several times a month, he and a handful of other hardy people start their journey to transform the unprepossessing nook he calls home in the Elephant and Castle area of south London, using a bicycle and a trolley. Armed with tools, some compost and a few plants, they set out on their epic quest to bring beauty to the local environment.

One of the first sites they took on was a derelict lot on a quiet inner-city street. Here they transformed a piece of concrete into a garden paradise. Today, the site is a vibrant oasis, filled with flowers and plants, a testament to the power of urban gardening.

2 The red-hot chili peppers

West Dean is the botanical English country house, nestled in the South Downs, near Chichester in West Sussex, the home of John and Annabelle Rendle, and their twin children, Philip and James. The couple have created an extensive collection of plants and flowers, which is open to the public.

The Rendles have been growing red-hot chili peppers for many years, and they are now harvesting huge quantities of the fiery peppers. The peppers are used in the family's cooking, and they also sell them at local markets.

3 The sky gardens

An artist and illustrator in London, Lyndon Bonython, was inspired by the whiteflower bush with abandon. With some stellar support, thanks to a generous sponsor, the artist launched his first major project. The project is called "Sky Gardens," and it is a series of installations that transform abandoned spaces in the city into beautiful gardens.

Originally from South Wales, he is an artist whose work explores the relationship between humans and nature. His installations are a response to the urban environment, and they aim to bring beauty and serenity to the city.

4 The railway gardener

An artist and illustrator in London, Lyndon Bonython, was inspired by the whiteflower bush with abandon. With some stellar support, thanks to a generous sponsor, the artist launched his first major project. The project is called "Sky Gardens," and it is a series of installations that transform abandoned spaces in the city into beautiful gardens.

Originally from South Wales, he is an artist whose work explores the relationship between humans and nature. His installations are a response to the urban environment, and they aim to bring beauty and serenity to the city.

5 The guerrilla gardener

Richard Reynolds began what he believes is a revolution in the urban jungle of London in September 2001. Several times a month, he and a handful of other hardy people start their journey to transform the unprepossessing nook he calls home in the Elephant and Castle area of south London, using a bicycle and a trolley. Armed with tools, some compost and a few plants, they set out on their epic quest to bring beauty to the local environment.

One of the first sites they took on was a derelict lot on a quiet inner-city street. Here they transformed a piece of concrete into a garden paradise. Today, the site is a vibrant oasis, filled with flowers and plants, a testament to the power of urban gardening.

2 The red-hot chili peppers

West Dean is the botanical English country house, nestled in the South Downs, near Chichester in West Sussex, the home of John and Annabelle Rendle, and their twin children, Philip and James. The couple have created an extensive collection of plants and flowers, which is open to the public.

The Rendles have been growing red-hot chili peppers for many years, and they are now harvesting huge quantities of the fiery peppers. The peppers are used in the family's cooking, and they also sell them at local markets.

3 The sky gardens

An artist and illustrator in London, Lyndon Bonython, was inspired by the whiteflower bush with abandon. With some stellar support, thanks to a generous sponsor, the artist launched his first major project. The project is called "Sky Gardens," and it is a series of installations that transform abandoned spaces in the city into beautiful gardens.

Originally from South Wales, he is an artist whose work explores the relationship between humans and nature. His installations are a response to the urban environment, and they aim to bring beauty and serenity to the city.

4 The railway gardener

An artist and illustrator in London, Lyndon Bonython, was inspired by the whiteflower bush with abandon. With some stellar support, thanks to a generous sponsor, the artist launched his first major project. The project is called "Sky Gardens," and it is a series of installations that transform abandoned spaces in the city into beautiful gardens.

Originally from South Wales, he is an artist whose work explores the relationship between humans and nature. His installations are a response to the urban environment, and they aim to bring beauty and serenity to the city.

5 The guerrilla gardener

Richard Reynolds began what he believes is a revolution in the urban jungle of London in September 2001. Several times a month, he and a handful of other hardy people start their journey to transform the unprepossessing nook he calls home in the Elephant and Castle area of south London, using a bicycle and a trolley. Armed with tools, some compost and a few plants, they set out on their epic quest to bring beauty to the local environment.

One of the first sites they took on was a derelict lot on a quiet inner-city street. Here they transformed a piece of concrete into a garden paradise. Today, the site is a vibrant oasis, filled with flowers and plants, a testament to the power of urban gardening.

2 The red-hot chili peppers

West Dean is the botanical English country house, nestled in the South Downs, near Chichester in West Sussex, the home of John and Annabelle Rendle, and their twin children, Philip and James. The couple have created an extensive collection of plants and flowers, which is open to the public.

The Rendles have been growing red-hot chili peppers for many years, and they are now harvesting huge quantities of the fiery peppers. The peppers are used in the family's cooking, and they also sell them at local markets.

3 The sky gardens

An artist and illustrator in London, Lyndon Bonython, was inspired by the whiteflower bush with abandon. With some stellar support, thanks to a generous sponsor, the artist launched his first major project. The project is called "Sky Gardens," and it is a series of installations that transform abandoned spaces in the city into beautiful gardens.

Originally from South Wales, he is an artist whose work explores the relationship between humans and nature. His installations are a response to the urban environment, and they aim to bring beauty and serenity to the city.

4 The railway gardener

An artist and illustrator in London, Lyndon Bonython, was inspired by the whiteflower bush with abandon. With some stellar support, thanks to a generous sponsor, the artist launched his first major project. The project is called "Sky Gardens," and it is a series of installations that transform abandoned spaces in the city into beautiful gardens.

Originally from South Wales, he is an artist whose work explores the relationship between humans and nature. His installations are a response to the urban environment, and they aim to bring beauty and serenity to the city.